“There are three primary ways that man learns. The first method is experimentation. The second is observation and the third is experience. Experimentation is the physical method and is the domain of science. Observation is mental or physical and is the domain of philosophy and experience is spiritual and is the domain of religion. We see these three methods of learning applied to freemasonry. In the Entered Apprentice degree, experimentation is encountered. Passed to the degree of Fellowcraft the brother finds himself on the mental plane. His method of progression is that of observation and he's given his first philosophical instruction. As a Master Mason, the candidate is introduced to the spiritual. It is here that his knowledge is acquired through personal experience.” From “Daily Doses of Light” by Steven G. Tiner
